Google Calendar integration. Simple management of your calendar events.

Type of events: private and public.

Existing events: All of them. New events: Those that will be added to the calendar.

Delete events: This document outlines a solution to the problem of users with un-installable java plugins accessing external files such as google docs and google calendar. On Windows systems, currently the most common cause of such issues is the presence of the java plugin browser helper object (BHO) from Sun. Microsoft has already addressed this in the upcoming Windows update. If your users are experiencing this issue, they will need to make changes to their java plugin installation. If java is installed and enabled, the BHO will run in the java process; if disabled, it won't. It can only be prevented from running at all in its own process or from being installed when java plugin is disabled. Disabling java runtime dependencies In order to prevent the BHO from executing, the user will need to: Check if the java plugin has been disabled. If so, enable the java plugin. Viewing the java plugin state In order to view the state of the java plugin, launch the java control panel, and scroll to Plugins -> Check Java Plugins. A large part of the development team is now focused on Windows 8, which will make support of older Operating systems less important, but we're still going to support them, in the same manner as we have

One note, we're not going to be making any more releases for XP. You can download our old XP version from the downloads page here. Also note that the latest release for Windows 7 is version 6.0.5. Until recently, LZMA Encoder has not been supported on 64bit Windows versions, and since .NET Framework 4.5 is available only for 32bit platforms, LZMA Encoder should not be used there. However, in this article we are going to show that even 64bit versions of Windows can be supported. Compatibility with old versions of Windows can be achieved by either creating a portable application or an installer program. A simple way to create a portable application is using self-extracting archives. These
